The satire with which the English assail their government, cannot well be imagined by one not conversant with their politics. Even we, little thought that Jim Crow could be so wittily turned, as it is in the following extract. Bitterly as we in this country assail political opponents, we never remember seeing anything so severe; yet the English Ministers bear it with the greatest good humor, and perhaps had a hearty laugh at themselves.

Jim Crow's Trip to Downing street.

I cam, good folk, from Downing street,*
A little time ago—
And ebry man dere wheel about, Wheel about and turn about

And do jis so ; Ebry Whig can weel about, and jump Jim Crow.

And first I saw de Beggarman, Who boder all de nation; Him turn about, and wheel about, To make de agitation. For justice to de Paddy land For all he turn about for is To keep de rent from falling. Turn about and wheel about,

If Wiggee no obey, we make 'em jump Jim Crow.

Dere's Massa Johnney: write him book To praise de constitution ; Den turn about, change ebry ting, And make de rebolut Him tell de people all de love For liberty him feel, And den him give 'em Poor Law Act, And lock 'em in bastile. Turn about and wheel about

And do jis so ; If poor man touch him wife, he make him jump Jim Crow. Den Massa Cupid, § him de man

Him turn about on cbry side If dey wont torn him out. Him Whig, him Tory, Radical, Just as it come to pass; Him anyting, him ebryting, Him nothing but an ass. Turn about and wheel about. And do jis so;

Ebry fool can turn about and jump Jim Crow.

Dere's old Lor Holland got de gout, And wheel about to dinners; Dere's Massa Rice," him rob he church, And prove de parsons winners. Dere's many oder litel men, Whose name I do not know, But all of dem can wheel about Wheel about, and turn about, And do jis so ; No nigger like de Ministers can jump Jim Crow.

Jock Camel,¶ ebry Stafford man

Him give a five pound note, Den punish ebry Ipswich man As dare to sell him vote. Him tell de Scotch dat ebry Lord Den turn about at London, and Make lady of him wife !" And do ins so : Ebry Scotchman turn about and jump Jim Crow.

Den dere's the Lord, who long ago,

De people great misfortun; Den turn about-he can no more-And do jis so ;

Sadvetton.—We have more than once alluded to this deplorable evil, and shall continue to mention it so often as we think any good can be effected. All admit that it is one of the most direful evils which affict society, yet few seem disposed to assign it to its most fertile cause, the inconsiderate levity with which it is treated by women. Generally women consider this detestable crime no impeachment of a man's honor or virtue, and will as readily enter into the important relation of marriage with him as with one whose conduct is without reproach. When we consider the influence of women in society—an influence which nature has established—and which is always greatest in the highest condition of civilization, we shall perceive at once that to exterminate seduction is completely within their power.

tion, we shall perceive at once that to exterminate se-duction is completely within their power.

In civilized countries, where the rights and dignity of women are recognised, no man will consent to be an outcast from their society. He will therefore ex-ercise towards them the most scrupulous good faith, if he cannot obtain their society on any other terms. If, then, they would make common cause against the soducer, and expel him entirely from their presence; if they should regard him asone with whom the marif he cannot obtain their society on any other terms. If, then, they would make common cause against the seducer, and expel him entirely from their presence; if they should regard him asone with whom the marriage tie was utterly unsafe, and who was utterly unfit to be a gaardian of woman's rights, honor or dignity: if they should deny to him all those courtesies and charities which, from the hand of woman, are among the brightest charms of life, and should leave him, on his bed of sickness, to the mercies of his own sex; if they should do all this, every seducer would cry out, like Cain, that his iniquity was greater than he could bear, and would present an example which few of his sex would dare to follow. And all this is in the power of women, for they exercise it daily towards their own sex. It is no racre than they exhibit, by common consent, towards the unfortunate victim of man's treachery. They make her an outcast from her own sex, and drive her, through stern necessity, to the lowest depth of dishonor. If she take one step in the descent, they will not allow her to return, but persist in driving her to the very bottom—But what is their conduct to the traitor? Do they withhold from him their approbation or confidence? Do they visit him with the slightest censure? On the contrary, they seem to triumph in his attentions.—Mothers court him for their daughters, and daughters court him for themselves; and they seem to glory in his heartless and perfidious devotions to them in proportion to the number of those crimes which ought to procure for him their scorn and ashorrence.

We do not complain of the judgment which women pronounce upon the delinquences of their own sex as too severe. They should be keepers of their own bonor, and should set up their own standard, and doubtless the most efficacious preventive of error, is this irrevocable sentence of condemnation. But we insist that they are unjust to themselves in condemning the victims of crime, and perfected with the intent to deceive, and with full knowled

From the Cincinnati Evening Post, May 2.

The Balloon Assension of Yesterday.—Mr. Clayton made yesterday a most adventurous experiment. His balloon did not fill with gas sufficient to ascend at the appointed hour. The day was beautiful, the concourse of witnesses very great. Finding that he could not ascend in the car, he made kim a seat of cords by tying them together, and with nothing but the balloon he rose and floated up some twenty feet so as to pass the fence of the enclosure, when he found further ascent impracticable. He descended and deliberately cast off all the uninflated part of the and deliberately cast off all the unintiated part of the balloon, leaving an open space in the bottom, more than ten feet in diameter. He then scated himself an the cords, and ascended in the most easy and graceful manner, waving his hat to the crowd. He hovered about the city a few minutes, iloating south-west, when his course changed, and was directly southeast. He appeared perfectly self-possessed, and there is reason to suppose he understands his business. It was the most beautiful, and the most thrilling ascent he has yet made in Cincinnati.

We copy the above from the Gazette of this morning, not having arrived at the scene of action, until the moment when Mr. Clayton cut himself loose and ascended from the intersection of Sixth and Vine streets, where he had landed from the enclosure.—Seating himself upon the cords of his balloon, which

Seating himself upon the cords of his balloon, which he had tied together for the purpose, he boldly ascended, without any thing but the light clothing in which he stood; the whole of the lower part of his balloon he cut away, leaving an opening of "more than tenfect in diameter." His situation appeared perilous in the extreme, but he waved his hat in triumph as long as he could be seen. We watched the balloon for upwards of an hour, and saw it descend behind the woods in the valley back of Newport, some time after sunset. We are anxious to hear the result, but are not without our fears. Should intelligence reach us from him, previous to our going to press, it shall be given.

(F) 30'clock.—We have just seen and has a hearty shake of the hand with our friend CLAYTON. He landed about ten miles from this eity, in a direct line, upon the top of a beach tree, near the farm of a Mr. Herbert. Surrounded as he was by his friends, and anxious as we were to let the public know that he was safe, we had no time for further particulars.

ACARD.—S. W. BRYHAM respectfully informs his friends and the public that he has completed the enlargement of his Saloon attached to his Bowery Steam Confectionary, for the better accommodation of Indies and gentlemen, on a much more improved plan, and it is now reopened for the season. S. W.
